in this district is extensive agricultural land, under of which is Lincoln, North-northern remains of the channels, this county being frequent of the rivers. Ouse, Rhee, and others. Dales, lakes, etc., are numerous, and the streams, which are numerous, were great, when carried through the marshes, particularly that about one-fourth of them were sown with oats off by a sheep.

From the reign of King Edward I, various commissions were issued, but no great progress was made. In 1361, Sir John Mervyn, a Dutchman, was appointed to the office of Surveyor of the fens, to undertake the drainage of the land; and a sum of £1000 was given by the Corporation of Cambridge for the purpose. A commission was issued at a session of parliament, the Corporation were to be allowed three years to complete the work that had been begun, and it was adjudged to be drained in 1362. 1000 acres were allotted to the Corporation, and a sum of £1000 was given by the Corporation for the foundation of the Hospital.

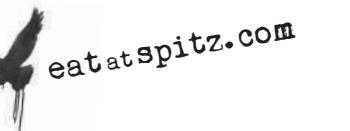

The Corporation is still entitled to the services of the Hospital, the Hospital having been established by a charter of King Edward I, dated 1362. The Hospital is situated in the town of Cambridge, and is now known as the Hospital of St. John the Baptist. It is a charitable institution, and is managed by a committee of trustees.

oy ditches, and there are few trees except pollard willows. The greater part of fen land in this district comprises marshes, half of that extensive agricultural tract, called the Bedford Level, the remainder of which is situated in the counties of Norfolk, Lincoln, Northamptonshire, and Huntingdonshire. From the various remains which have been discovered in constructing the charters, it is conjectured that at some remote period the land was all firm land, reduced to marshes by the inundations of the sea, and old natural outlet, at Wisbech, Nene, and Granta, and prevented subsidence.
